The Council of Chalcedon (451 CE) led to a split in the eastern church that remains until today. This talk traces the early decades of this schism through the powerful narratives of those who ultimately lost imperial support. It argues that in this era of political and religious upheaval, skillful stories of violent persecution challenged the legitimacy of the imperial church by turning would-be heretics into heroic martyr-saints.